Access to quality education in India is universally seen as “the passport out of poverty,” and since half of India’s population is under the age of 25, this has become more important than ever in determining India’s destiny. When access to quality education is denied, it shapes the entire lives of individuals, and it can affect the lives of their families for generations. Across the Indian economy, stable jobs with strong earning potential require high proficiency in English, yet the large majority of students can only afford to attend government-funded hindi-medium schools, where the standard of quality is highly variable, depending on the community.

In the case of underprivileged girls and young women in India, the transformative effect of English language education is dramatically amplified.

Recognizing how investing in the education of young women has such a ripple effect on society, ILSC–New Delhi created the Learn to Earn Program in 2010. LTE candidates are rigorously screened and carefully selected for the program based on their potential to inspire further development in their communities. Candidates benefit from an international standard of English education and study alongside foreign students from around the world. For many LTE participants, they are the first members of their families to learn English, and most are the first women in their families to have studied beyond high school.

Upon completing the LTE program, candidates receive approximately 360 hours of instruction in English over 24 weeks of study. They also receive additional workshops that prepare them for the workplace, including resume writing, interview skills, and financial literacy. The candidates are then placed in reputable companies on internships, where they gain valuable work experience and use their language skills.

PROGRESS CHECKS

At the end of every four-week session (60 hours of class time), instructors will assess the candidate’s progress, including a written exam and an oral evaluation.

SPONSORS RECEIVE:

- A photo and short write-up on your sponsored student
- Sessional progress check results
- Post-graduation updates and job reports from their employers
- The “before” and “after” recorded oral assessment of your sponsored student
